One evening at supper, a spring night, one evening at supper, a spring night, with the odor of the fresh grasses and the budding leaves perfuming the air, the hired man, Johnson, delivered a most startling piece of news.

"Did you hear o' the robbery at the Peak?—killin' too, I understand. Jim Bartlett, from the Creek, passed to-day, and hereas a stalling as Seema a garage.

and he was a-tellin' me. Seems a gang o' these plain fellows, rough riders, I o' these plain fellows, rough riders, it reckon, dropped into a camp last night and took all the boys' gold and shot two o' the miners. They've made for the mountains, it's 'sposed, but the hull peak is after them. They'll swing the crowd if they catch 'em."

"Who are the desperadoes?" asked

Lathrop. 'There were only three o' 'em, and Black Dan, him as was hung in New Mexico, was one. I guess they don't know the other," replied Johnson. "Black Dan!" said the master, "I thought he was on the Pacific coast. He's one of the worst men ever in this State. I hope they will catch the party and serve them with border justice, quick and sure. I shall feel better to know that the rascal is under the sod."

"Why, Ralph!" said his wife Nellie, "you are surely not afraid of the man.
Why should you wish him evil?"

"He's a terror to any community and a danger to any State," returned her hus-band. "A murderer, and worse; bung in New Mexico for revolting crimes, but rescued by his comrades; a man whose heart is as black as his flowing beard, and whose hands are red with human blood. I wish him no evil-only justice and a short rope! And he'll get it if the Peak boys catch him."

Quiet Mrs. Lathrop looked wondering-ly at her husband. Surely this noted desperado must be of the worst, that Ralph should speak so of him. And the memory of her husband's words came to her afterwards.

Night fell, the shadow of a departing winter rendering chill all the world bebind him, as the doors were closed and barred-for this ranch was miles from the nearest neighbor-fresh logs were thrown upon the fire, while the little

"Well," said Johnson, at last, as he rose to go to the loft and his bed, "I only hope with you, Mr. Lathrop, that they may catch em. The country'll be better without 'em."

An hour later sleep ruled, and not un til the early dawn, fresh and rosy, crept over the eastern hill tops did the little household under its doors again. With Three days later, Mrs. Lathrop received the return of day thoughts of the evening the thanks of the Pike's Peak camp and before were forgotten. What had they to do with the wolves? They must care er live alone, and her husband is now a for the sheep. Breakfast was over and the hired man as the brave woman who caught Black had departed with the herd for the hills, distant some three miles, where he would be absent until night, when suddenly Mr. Lathrop called to his wife from the log barn. The young woman ran to the door.

"Nellie, dear," said her husband, "I've just found, greatly to my surprise, that we're out of salt. The sheep need it, and I must have a barrel to-day. I've got to go to the Creek for it, and will not be back before night. Johnson will be up with the sheep early. Good bye."

A wave of the hand, a rattle of the heavy wagon, the quick beat of the horses' hoofs, and Frank Lathrop was gone, leaving his young wife alone in the road-side ranch. But the frontier woman turned back into her cabin after she had watched her husband out of sight, with before her husband's return by the creeping shadows upon the distant mountain side. As she worked her back was turned toward the open door, and she did not see the darker shadows that suddenly fell across the rough fleor, nor note the crunch of heavy bacts upon the fresh green grass, until a resounding footfall upon the step startled her, and she turned quickly to meet the first caller who had quickly to meet the first caller who had appeared that day—a tall, flerce-looking bearded man, who stood before her. "Missus, who lives here?"

The tone was harsh and threatening, but the question was a common one, and Nellie replied:
"My husband; Mr. Lathrop, and myself."

"Where's the boss?"
"My husband? He's gone to the Creek for a barrel of salt."

"Where's your hired help?"
"We only have one man, and he is not here now. Can I do anything for you?" "Yes," growled the black bearded one. "Yes, yer can. Yer can do this fer me. Git a dinner for three hungry cusses as hasn't had time to get their own. Come in, boys, it's all clear. The cock's away, raught but the ken's at home, an' we'll have dinner."

For a moment poor Mrs. Lathrop felt faint, and the world, sunlit and warm, danced before her eyes, then full strength came again as she saw this burly stranger fling himself into a chair and lay two coromous pistols beside his elbow on the table, while a pair of others, each as wild and tattered and fierce-looking as the leader, followed him; full of strength, even while she realized who it was that sat within her kitchen, the man "whose heart was as black as his beard"—Black Dan, the ruffian of New Mexico, who only two days ago, with these very companions, had committed robbery and larger. This was the man who demanded linner, and Mrs. Lathrop knew it.

"I'm't waste yer time, missus," suddealy hoke the leader, turning quickly and fasterling his, fierce, bold eyes upon the young hostess. "don't waste your time nor yer words. Git dinner."

We know this.

Poor Nellie heard all this, believing not one word, but working steadily on, frying eggs, making tea and supplying the table with bread and butter and cake. When all was ready she placed chairs and told her enforced guests that dinner was prepared for them American was prepared for them. Awaiting no second invitation they hastily seated themselves and began to eat.
Suddenly the leader of the trip paused

Mechanically Mrs. Lathrop took the ammunition.

But even as she did so a sudden idea, an inspiration almost, flashed through her brain. These men were now un-armed; her husband's double barreled shotgun loaded stood in the corner; why not capture the murderers berself? Instantly the brave woman put the

A tremendous roar shook the air; two utshooting flames followed by two puffs of blue smoke; two beavy falls; then a dark figure drawing himself out of the open doorway. That was all. And as the brave woman leaned back against the wall of her cabin she heard the song of the birds out-side, and she saw the melhousehold still talked of the tragedy at low sunlight fleck the rough floor, but the Peak and the fleeing robbers pursued she did not see her onemies. Then she fainted.

But close before her, doubly fierce in death lay the forms of two men, while without, upon the green grass, writhed Black Dan, sightless and filled with wounds. Twenty minutes later the hired man, Moderate Profits.

We frequently hear young men say they will not engage in farming because the profits are so small. They prefer to go into some business where they can make a fortune in a few years and then retire. Now all this sounds well to young men, but the older ones could tell the other side of the story. Large profits generally mean great risks. Of all those who start in to make a fortune, very few succeed. The large majority fail, and are soon lost sight of in the busy world. It is true that, as a rule, the profits are small in farming, but they are sure. There is no other business so sure, in the watched her husband out of sight, with not a thought of dagenr and hardly one of loneliness amid all the work which her busy hands could find to do.

It was high neon. For a little the young mistress had rened, while the soft warmth of the springtime had almost lulled her to sleep. Then she had prepared and eaten a plain dinner, all alone, and now she was engaged in washing the few dishes used, humming a low love song as she worked, and counting the flight of the moments that intervened before her husband's return by the creeping shadows upon the distant mountain side. As she worked her back was turned years, that all be gets is his living for all his work, and as time goes on and his fortune increases, he will readily take more satisfaction in steady work, year in and year out, than in aimost unything else.

There is a satisfaction in doing well and laying by a little each year. The farmer can do this, but he cannot get rich at once. We know of no business to-day that offers so many attractions to day that offers so many attractions to a young man fond of work and of nature as that of farming. We wish many more of our young men could see this in the light in which some do see it, and prepare themselves to take hold of the work with an earnest determination to win a place and name as well as a competency. There is room for all; the markets are seldom, if ever, overstocked. There is a great variety in this work. It may be done North or South, East or West, wherever the opening offers best. Farming is no business for drones or lazy fellows, but is worthy of the attention of all smart boys who wish a dead sure thing.

Healthy People Sometimes Laugh

At the sufferings of dyspeptics, and say that their pains and distresses are imaginary. This is not meant for cruelty, but it is cruelty, all the same. A person who has a crooked foot, or a wounded hand, or a sightless eye, calls forth sympathy by the exhibition of the defective member.
